BROWN GOES SHOPPING

HIS EXPERIENCE AS RELATED AT

arm chair and related in a confidential manner the following story:

"Like most men, I don't go shopping often, but at Christmas times I always undertake one or two of these expeditions. Immediately after dinner my wife and I made for the city. We did not visit many stores, but-but we stayed long where we went. You know that's a woman's way of doing it." Then my employer named a number of the establishments they had

"And you don't call those many stores?" I interrupted.
"Well, I do; but my wife did not seem to "Well, I do; but my wife did not seem to think so. At Kann's we stayed until we were put out. The elevators had stopped and we were compelled to walk down from the fourth floor. If ever you want to be among the last to leave a place you just take Mrs. Brown with you. She is a proverbial last—be it at the table, retiring, at the opera, or deciding a question. After all this elevantics I was then to death but this galavanting I was tired to death, but my wife seemed but little affected. By Jove! but women seem to have great powers of endurance in shopping. I was most dead to get to some place where I could rest my weary l'mbs and—and—my corn."

Here I laughed again and remarked, "I thought you limped as you came in this morning."

morning. Nurses His Misery.

"Yes, that's the cause. Every time we were near a counter I would lean against it and pick up my aching foot. Then Mrs. Brown would say: 'Don't do that! You will knock something off, or 'You will break this glass case!' or 'That isn't dignified,' at which I would again straighten up. It seemed as though every one aimed at that toe, and I myself inflicted many a knock upon it.

"As we were waiting for the 9th street car at Pennsylvania avenue, I remembered that I was as hungry as a bear, so I said that I was as hungry as a bear, so I said to my wife, 'Suppose we go over to that lunch room and get a cup of coffee. I really think you need it after this jaunting.'

"I knew I wanted it, whether I 'needed' it or not, but I thought this was the better way to put the suggestion. She consented, and we walked into the store. I put all my bundles on a chair, took off my overcoat, hung up my hat, cleared my throat and made myself comfortable for half an hour.

"'We want two cups of coffee,' I said to the girl, 'and-what else will you have, mamma?' I continued, turning to my wife. "I am very sorry, but we have no cof-fee, interrupted the girl.
"This was what I wanted most, but I looked at the pile of bundles and my overcoat and concluded that we had best remain and take tea. and take tea.

"Well, we will have two cups of tea,' I returned. 'And—what else will you have, 'mamma?" I again asked Mrs. Brown.

Now, this gives you an exhibition of my wife's slowness. She had not yet replied to my question.

"'I am sorry, but we have no tea.' slowly drawled the girl with no animation.
"I was mad. I said nothing more, but hurriedly getting on my coat and gathering up my bundles we left. I said to my wife few doors above and get what we wanted. As we reached this establishment the curtains in the door were being pulled down and I realized that we were left. I wanted that coffee more than did Mrs. Brown, but I did not wish her to know it.
"'It is too bad you have been so disap-

What Causes Delay. "But you ought to have something,' I replied in a solicitous tone. 'You need it. We will go into this restaurant and get a club sandwich.

"So we went in, and again I put down my bundles, took off my coat, hung up my hat and took a comfortable seat. We enjoyed our repast and then boarded a car for home. When I gave the conductor the fare he informed me that he did not know whether o not he could take me to my destination, as there was a car off the track somewhere outside the city. I looked at my watch and found it was after train time, so there was nothing left but to stay in the car. When we got into the suburbs we met the crippled car and were delayed quite a while. Of course, my wife told me during these moments of waiting that if we had come directly home without waiting to get that club sandwich we would not have encounthe collation was essential to her health, and I secretly knew it was necessary for the preservation of my good nature. We reached home at 1 o'clock. I did not feel so tired then, but I must have been, as I did not awaken this morning until nearly 7

"So that accounts for your being four ninutes late," I rejoined.
"Yes, and I saw more things than I ever knew stores kept; but I can't get it straight in my mind whether a bias flounce is worn whether a bertha is a fixing for the waist or is designed for the bottom of the skirt. Where's the morning mail?"

MILES OGLE'S ARREST ..

Best Christmas Present the Secret Service Ever Received.

"Something apropos of Christmas, and with a flavor of secret service, eh?" Chief Wilkie smoked for a moment, sent rings of blue-gray smoke circling toward the crackling wood fire in his cozy office in the Treasury building, contemplated the dancing flames thoughtfully, and continued. "You remember Miles Ogle, the desperado-counterfeiter, who was the bete noir of the government officers for nearly a quarter of a century? Of course you do. Miles began his spectacular career out in Indiana as a member of the so-called Reno gang of outlaws, and in a remarkably brief period established a record for cold-blooded wickedness that eclipsed his more conservative companions.

"Life never meant anything when it stood in the way of freedom, and many a brave fellow who undertook to check the man's mad career met a sudden and san-gulnary death. So when Miles turned his attention to counterfeiting and directed his really marvelous talent to the mastering of the art of engraving, he not only succeeded ir making a good counterfeit, but he impressed upon the government officers that he was a hard man to catch and quite as hard to hold. "In the autumn of 1884 two new counterfeits, extensively circulated through the middle west, set the commercial section of the public by the ears, and every available agent of this service was put at work on the case. There was a $10 note on the Third National Bank of Cincinnati and a $20 silver certificate, and they were distributed broadcast through the principal towns of Ohio, Indiana and Kentucky. "The individuality of Ogle's work was so marked that it was almost instantly deundaunted courage, was in charge of op-erations, and, with his assistants, seeking such shelter from the wintry blasts as they could obtain, kept up the weary vigil. "Half frozen and unable to relax their watchfulness aver large areas to see the course of the course

Could obtain, kept up the weary vigil.

"Half frozen and unable to relax their watchfulness even long enough to get a bite to eat, they 'covered' the house from daylight until dusk, and at a moment when it seemed as if they must give up from sheer exhaustion, were thrilled by the sight of Ogle, who walked swiftly to the door and went in without knocking.

"Bauer waited long enough for his man to get comfortably settled in the house and then made a quick move. He entered the side door, one of his assistants the front and the other the rear. Bauer found Ogle seated in a chair only a few feet from the door the door the door the door the long barrel of his six-shooter.

"Oh, no," he replied, good naturedly.

"Truth to tell, I overslept myself this morning, and I can only lay the cause to going shopping with my wife last night."

Then he seated himself comfortably in his arm chair and related in a confidential are chair and related in a confidential and related in the house and then made a quick move. He entered the side door this assistants the

When he was released he went at it again, but, as Kipling says, "that is another story." His arrest was the best Christmas present the service ever received."

IN NORTH DAKOTA STORM. Agents of Santa Claus Remain All Night in a Shack.

"Christmas day will be the nineteenth anniversary of an event which I will always remember," Mr. Frank E. Sebring, financial clerk of the Police Court, remarked yesterday afternoon.

"I was postmaster at New Rockford, N. D., during 1883, and Christmas day of that year dawned clear and cold, and there was a thick covering of snow on the ground, it having snowed all of the day and night before, and as a result numerous sleighing parties had been planned by the young people to take place after dinner.

"I went down to the post office in the morning to sort the mail, and shortly after arriving there one of the residents of the town came in, having just returned from s trip down the country, and told me that while on his way home he had stopped at a shanty about twelve miles from New Rock-ford to warm himself. He found affairs in a bad state, he said; a woman with her four children had no fire and nothing to eat. He purposed that we should return to the place with provisions and fuel, which we did, after I distributed the noon mail. "In the meantime he had the sleigh, which was a large affair, loaded with provisions, fuel and toys for the children, and in addition we carried a sum of money for the mother. The weather, as I said before, was clear and cold, but you can never tell how the day is going to end. We arrived there in a short time, and the poor woman wept for joy when she saw what we had, while the children, who had been neglected by Santa Claus the night before, were highly elated with the toys. About 5 o'clock my friend happened to look out of the window and announced that it was snowing and that the wind was coming up. We made our departure at once. After proceeding a short distance the wind increased in force, whirling the snow around in every direction until it was impossible to see three feet ahead, but we continued on our journey. After going on for a time and not seeing any familiar landmarks we drew up to get our bearings, and on looking around found that we had strayed from the trail.

"I suggested that I would get out and look for it, but my friend would only con-sent on condition that I would take one end The rope was about sixty feet long. and he held one end while I fastened the other around my waist. Leaving the sleigh I made a wide circle, but was unable to find the trail. We lit two lanters we had and placed them under the buffalo laprobes, which enabled us to keep warm. There was nothing to do but keep on driving, and that we did, and about 11 o'clock we came upon an abandoned shack, minus a door, but it was better than remaining out on the plains in a blizzard all night, and we decided to stay there until morning. The horses were unhitched and driven inside, and there we remained.

"It cleared off about 6 o'clock in the morning and we started for home, arriving there about 11 o'clock."

DAY HE WILL NEVER FORGET. Incident at Sea When Senator Perkins Was a Boy.

"Christmas day, 1854, is one that I will never forget," said Senator Perkins of California. "I was a boy then and at sea. The crew joined in a mutiny, and there was a free, all-around fight, in which there was many a head broken, and, among others, the cook was so badly used up that he had to take to his bunk. Our Christmas dinner consisted of hard tack and cold beef.

"We had put to sea," continued Senator Perkins, "in a new vessel that had been built in the winter time, and she leaked. We had a load of lumber, and were off the Bay of Fundy. We had put out of St. John's, New Brunswick, and were bound for Dublin. When the vessel began leaking the crew rebelled and demanded that the Oliver Smith, turn about and return to the port we had left. The men had all been paid in advance for the voyage, and to go back meant to lose all the money that had been turned over to them. "I was a small boy, but I remember the man at the wheel had abandoned his post, and I steered the vessel. There were any number of broken heads when the crew quieted down, and we returned to New Brunswick, and the trip was abandoned for the time."

ON THE FRONTIER.

Maj. Sylvester's Christmas Dinner in Southern Utah.

"The manner of celebrating Christmas has changed in many details within the past score of years," said Major Richard Sylvester. "This is expecially true of the cities. The old-time methods of making the children happy and joyful have in a great measure given way to the modern, up-todate manner of doing things, which in no way, perhaps, detracts from the enjoyment of all concerned. "It was twenty years ago, while I was in the Indian service in southern Utah, with half a dozen companions, being the only whites within hundreds of miles—myself a young man experiencing the first impression of solitude during a frigid winter two thousand miles from home—that I enjoyed a frontier Christmas dinner. Those who were my associates were husbands and fathers whom the mountains of snow separated from wives and chl'dren. I was a youth away from mother and sweetheart, and having always possessed a keen regard for Christmas time, it fell to my lot to arrange the dinner, and the first man who found fault with it had to wash the dishes—mostly tin and iron. This to-be-avoided pleasure was not indulged in by any of the party, which means that the feast was beyong their criticism.

"Andy Gaw, one of the finest, sleekest Chinamen who ever swung a skillet, was our cook. I resurrected Andy in a mining camp near Salt Lake and induced him to prepare our meals at $60 a month. He assumed the name of Andy while working for towns of Ohio, Indiana and Kentucky.

"The individuality of Ogle's work was so marked that it was almost instantly determined who was responsible for the flood of spurious bills, and all efforts were directed toward locating the cunning desperado. The hunt covered many states, and was prosecuted with a vigor that could have but one result.

"In December the circles made by the pursuing officers grew smaller and smaller, with Memphis, Tenn., as their center. Among other information which was secured was a statement which might or might not have been true that Ogle would spend Christmas at the home of a friend who lived in Memphis, and a constant watch was maintained over that particular cottage.

"Christmas day of that year was the coldest in the meteorological history of that section, the thermometer marking the to-date manner, even though we were de-nied the accompaniment of snow to lend naturalness to the occasion. "About two weeks before Christmas officers and men chipped in, and with our 'can-teen fund' managed to supply the culinary departments of our various messes. With the money thus contributed we bought up a lot of chickens, cranberries, rice, celery, in the shape of beer and wine.

"It might also be intimated that nearly every mess came into possession of mem-bers of the feathery tribe without going through the formality of a purchase, but we were unable to distinguish any difference between the chickens purchased and those secured in other ways, when it came to the eating. The soldiers were not affected with any prickings of conscience. The chickens were all of the game species, and while they were fattening for the feast in the coops we had many a cock fight to while away the time.

"When Christmas day arrived all duty excepting the necessary guard-was suspended and the soldiers turned out to have a good time. Company D in the 1st Nebraska Volunteers was composed mostly of stu-dents from universities around Lincoln, and among the number were members of the state university foot ball team. From that circumstance it happened that Company D challenged the balance of the regiment to a game of foot ball. "The contest took place Christmas morn ing. Our gridiron was on a plot of ground that had formerly been used as a rice field, and it wasn't the smoothest piece of the ground in the world, either. Of course, we had no regular foot ball suits, so the players stuffed their khaki uniforms with rice straw. The game proved a great attrac-tion, and along the sidelines stood hundreds of native Filipinos from the surrounding country and villages. country and villages.

"At first they didn't seem able to appreciate foot ball as a sport, and were curious to know what kind of a 'combate' was going on. But later they became very much interested, and it took a strong guard to keep the native spectators from rushing in and taking a hand in the tumble. The game was weryed them loudly in a patriotic spirit and thought surely they were becoming pacific. We saw the purpose and tact of the band leader later, when each musician took off his hat and passed through the crowd taking up a collection

"Our festivities closed that night with a concert by our own regimental band which, as a concluding number, played "Home, Sweet Home," and turned our thoughts back to the home folks across the sea."

Two Senators Who Found They Were Not Well Known. Senator Vest of Missouri was taught a lesson on the nothingness of fame a few years ago, which he tells his friends occasionally. He was called out of the Senate chamber by his colleague, Mr. Cockrell, in order that the two senators from Missouri might meet a delegation from their state. Senator Cockrell was talking to the assemblage of his constituents as Senator Vest joined him. He introduced his colleague. After five or ten minutes had passed and Mr. Vest had talked to all of his visitors,

But Senator Vest's experience was more than equaled by one of the late Senator John Sherman of Ohio, who, on one occasion, many years ago, was visited by an amateur correspondent of a western paper who undertook to secure the views of senators on some public question. When he approached Senator Sherman, whom he had recognized as a senator only by the fact approached Senator Sherman, whom he had recognized as a senator only by the fact that he was standing in the Senate lobby, he inquired his name, and being told that asked for his initials, then his state and finally his politics. After he had secured this preliminary information he called for his views.
